The Palazzo, built in 1299 by Arnolfo di Cambio, was the residence of the “Signoria” from the XV century and then from 1540 became the Medici family home, where the Vasari work of arts would lavish and stand out: a 500 century hall, Francesco I small study, Eleonora’s quarters and the Elements quarter. In the house scattered with fundamental works of art from the renaissance period of sculptures, like Genio della Vittoria of Michelangelo and the Giuditta e Oloferne of Donatello

Vasari (b. 1511, Arezzo, d. 1574, Firenze)

*With the growth of his stature and cultural ambitions when he was compiling and writing his book, the Lives of the Artists, the nature of Vasari's commissions fundamentally altered in the final thirty years of his life, from individual works such as altarpieces to grand enterprises in different media requiring a controlling hand over a large body of assistants. To accomplish these great projects he organized a vast workshop on a scale unprecedented in Florence.*

The best example of the grand enterprises are the ceiling and walls of the main room, the Sala del Cinquecento, in the Palazzo del Signoria in Florence, completed 1565. The ceiling is divided into 39 panels depicting episodes from the history of Florence and the Grand-duchy of Tuscany. Along the upper part of the walls are battle scenes by Vasari, below are a series of statues and marble groups.
